Quantum computer may be built through a year or two. Researchers are working to achieve quantum computers, which could be used to perform large calculations incredibly fast. Google has created a working prototype of a quantum computer in silicon, a key part of a move toward building a fully-operational device by 2017. Jeff Clegg, a professor of electrical engineering and computer science at the University of California, Berkeley, who has been working on quantum computing for years, called the project an advance in the field. "I think this is the next major milestone," Clegg told The Verge. He added, "It's important because it really marks the end of the very early years of a field that has been developing for the last 15-20 years." He's not the only one who thinks this is a major achievement. "A breakthrough of the first order is always a big deal, and it's a big deal," said Robert Conley, chief architect at Rigetti Computing in California. However, the semiconductor process that is used in the device is not easy to reproduce in order to make a commercially viable computer, Conley told The Verge. The field is difficult because the phenomenon that allows for quantum mechanics to work, the superposition of quantum states, is only present when the object is extremely cold. Instead, the field relies on quantum dot transistors, in which electrons are confined to a tiny spot inside a material with a semiconductor process, similar to how we make transistors in modern computing. The team developed a quantum processor in silicon called a silicon-based quantum processor that can be used for quantum simulations and for quantum computing. It uses 144 quantum dots, with the idea of being able to scale up the technology into a larger quantum computer in the future, according to Fox. However, the team's processor has two major drawbacks: it's not yet scalable, meaning it's not ready to use in a commercial product, and it's inefficient for large-scale quantum computing. The device also requires extraordinary processing power to run. "There's no way we could build a massive one of these things at this size and in this short of a time," said Clegg. "It's not the number of qubits [that's
